Meet the family:

Penny thought her parenting days were over when her grown son moved out. Then Social Services reached Penny with the alarming news that her niece's three young children needed adopting. To keep her family together, Penny embraced the responsibility of raising them. Fast forward ten years. Again, Social Services reached out. This time her niece's premature twins were at risk of separation from each other and their biological family.

"If I did not take these children, there would be no guarantee our family would have seen them again, or that they would have stayed together... ."

With the addition of the twins, Penny's mobile home rental was overcrowded. Trying to provide better, she moved her family to a rental home; however, the high cost of rentals forced Penny to move to a place still too small. Now a future homeowner, Penny will no longer worry about moving each year with the increase of rent driving her options. Penny and her family will have peace of mind with the stability that comes with affordable housing in a home the whole family can sit down for meals—a home with a yard for her children to play.
